"Wave-o-Matic" is an "After Effects" script Which Enables the user to rapidly create wave-like movement on either the rotational properties and also the place property of any coating (s). Letting the user to fully customize the tide to some extent.

Make it Float?

Client: "Hey, how will you make this float onto a few waters"...

Client: "Oh, and can you create the item fly? A random pattern which is not predetermined and may be altered at any moment. Just in the event, you understand, we will need to change everything?"

Motion Designer: "f*ck"

Now making something float or fly seems simple... I mean Super simple? Not too much, and certainly not if you've got to animate several. Well now that is about to change, this tide not only copes with waving but also mimicking that of a thing drifting. With lots of settings that are customizable, you're in a position to genuinely control the tide of any item at any rate, and at any given moment on any angle. Can I mention? Now do this with keyframes... Trust me that your life is all about to change.

Do Not Break Your Rigs!

Employing multiple complicated movements can break all sorts Of things particularly when they're powered through expressions. Ever implemented some cool scripted motion rather than being able to do anything else... it seems like being shot from the foot, not that I understand what sounds like... However, that does not need to be the situation. Wave-o-Matic works completely with any keyframed coating without damaging your own keyframes. In addition, it is going to work with any layer which has expressions implemented. BAM! Now try and tell me that is not changing your thoughts.

Utilizing Everything in 3D & 2D

2D and 3D is a Massive portion of After Effects and be able to use the space are really incredible. This not only functions with only the 2D environment it excels in all 3D too. Tell you what, simply check out this video and I will just shut up.
